

abstract:

Environmental temperature is a very strong selective force, as evidenced by adaptive genetic variation observed along geographic temperature gradients. Climate change is causing shifts in environmental temperature regimes in many habitats, forcing natural populations to move, adapt, or go extinct. I will discuss two willow leaf beetle systems that are models for investigating mechanisms by which climate change affects native insect populations.